I had the same thought about what they are defining as habitat. Is it all seasons or just leks and nesting habitat? Also, Oregon' numbers seem very strange "protecting over 90% of male and leks but only 38% of occupied habitat"

See updated table attached.

I was going to come chat about the results with you but I know you're on a phone call... For Idaho, the info for Alternative D actually came from a different report (because they apparently couldn't squeeze one more paragraph into the 900 page DEIS).

I put all the different metrics in quotes instead of changing the wording so you could see exactly how everything was written originally just in case there are minor differences. I know we discussed gathering additional metrics but there's not a whole lot more out there. I may be able to gather specific numbers of leks and males. I'm going to continue working on Utah and Nevada. Let me know if you'd like me to add those items in.
