The interview followed on the release last month of our sage-grouse report and focused on the historic success of our collaborative, voluntary, science-based approach to conservation that has impacted 4.4 million acres of private land, and area twice the size of Yellowstone National Park. Chief Weller talked in depth about two science-based conservation practices in particular--fence marking in Wyoming and reducing conifer encroachment in Oregon. The piece will be broadcast across public radios in the West with a target specifically of OR, CO, NV and WY.
