Pat,
Be happy to. Note in my e-mail to you I stated "I guess I missed or misunderstood your statement that the reviewers "liked" the underlying principles." Since you described your notes as "a bit rambly" and they are your notes I thought I would first start with you and avoid confusion or some embarrassment on your part. Now, my question was to you. Will you please answer it.

Jack -

Thanks for your feedback. Please be sure to copy the entire team when you send e-mails so that we can all stay current with discussions. Also, please make sure that you express your concerns on the conference calls to ensure that we can come to an agreement as a team without losing time.

Thanks - Pat

I guess I missed or misunderstood your statement that the reviewers "liked" the underlying principles. I have attached your notes with observations from my reading of the peer-review comments. Given these comments I think it only fair to say the reviewers expressed deep concern over the underlying principles. Wouldn't you agree?

Subject: notes from today's call they are a bit rambly. I added Jodie's notes on the bottom of what I took. I hope something makes sense here.

I can't make the next call as scheduled as I will be on an airplane. But I think the call should proceed. Yes, I accept homework.

Noreen and Michael Bean will take forward the conundrum of timing on the final report to the Task Force next week. They will explain the need to balance the depth of any analyses with the desire of different management entities to get a quick turnaround. I suggested an interim status report of sorts - like the map - so that the planning efforts could continue while we gained more time to do more quantitative analyses. Noreen and Michael will present that at the meeting on Wednesday and get back to me with timelines.

Again my apologies for missing the end of the call - I just could not get out of the next commitment which was scheduled after our call was scheduled. However, I knew it would be in good hands (and it sounds like you made more progress without me!).
