Subject Editors

Subject Editors serve a key role in the peer review process. They function to uphold the standards of Service journals through the coordination of the peer review of manuscripts and by making summary recommendations to the Editor-In-Chief, based on the reviews they have received and their assessment of the manuscript.

The identity of specific Subject Editors is not revealed to authors, except when requested by the Subject Editor. However, in recognition of their volunteer service and in order to provide a sense of the breadth and extent of expertise, here we provide a list of the initial group of Subject Editors by Region for the Journal of Fish and Wildlife Management and North American Fauna as of April, 2009.

Reviewers

Reviewers are the backbone of the peer review system and perform the bulk of the heavy lifting in the publication process. The success of peer review relies on a community of experts able to carry out impartial reviews of manuscripts. Reviewers are recruited from within the Service, as well as other agencies and organizations. Reviewers can volunteer their services by signing up on the online submission sites for the Journal of Fish and Wildlife Management and North American Fauna.
