

Rendezvous site in northwestern Alaska where a female wolverine kept her two kits in late June 1979. The kits were kept under this remnant snowdrift where melt water formed a cavern under the length of the snowdrift (spotting scope on a tripod for size comparison). Remnant snowdrifts were commonly used as maternal den sites or rendezvous sites (Magoun 1985, p. 73).