LEWIS & CLARK NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE

Located in the Columbia River, the Lewis and Clark National Wildlife Refuge is part of the largest marsh in northwestern Oregon. The Refuge's estuary islands form a chain that begins at Tongue Point and follows the Oregon shore of the Columbia's main river channel east to Welch Island. The Refuge includes 33,000 acres of islands, sandbars, mud flats and tidal marshes which provide habitat for a variety of fish and waterfowl.

Hunting of geese, ducks, coots, and snipe is permitted on the shorelines and interior sloughs of Refuge islands in accordance with federal and state hunting regulations. The hunting of all other species is prohibited. The portions of Karlson Island and all of Miller Sands Island, including the partially enclosed lagoon, are closed to hunting (see map). In addition, all other Refuge lands outside the designated portions of the Refuge islands are also closed to waterfowl hunting, including the Tongue Point, Emerald Heights and Brownsmead Units.

BOATING

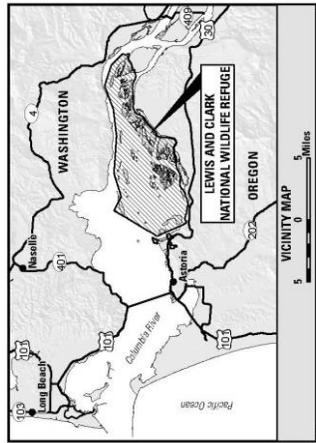

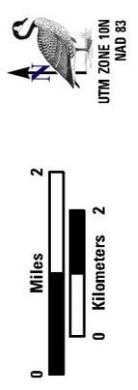

The islands of Lewis and Clark Refuge are accessible only by boat. Tidal flows and fluctuations, strong wakes from ships, and strong winds can make boating difficult and sometimes dangerous. Deep channels separate most islands at high tide, but tide tables and navigation charts should be consulted to avoid grounding on sandbars. If your boat becomes stuck in the mud, wait for the next high tide to float it free. In Oregon, boat launch sites are located at Aldritch Point near the Brownsmead area and at the John Day boat ramp east of Astoria. In Washington, launch ramps are located at the Cathlamet Marina, at mile marker 30 off of State Highway 4, adjacent to Skamokawa Vista Park and at Willow Grove west of Longview.
