"Forty-five Years at Mono Lake"

*A photographic presentation
by Stephen Remington*

"For 45 years Mono Lake and the ghost town of Bodie have worked their magic on me. This March, for the first time in over a year, I returned to Mono Lake. As expected, the water level continues to drop due to the drought, and I was thoroughly depressed for an hour or so until the place had time to have its way with me again. Funny how such a sterile, weird looking lake can worm its way into your heart. I can recite a few facts about the Mono Lake and the birds it supports, but I feel more comfortable encouraging others to experience it and showing them where to look. I will let my photographs tell the rest of the story."

"In 1965, I inherited my father's Kodak Retina camera. This was a big step up from the Kodak Brownies I had been using for as long as I could remember. I quickly surprised myself with the quality of several landscapes I shot and was off and running from there. Birds have been an enduring interest my whole life. Backpacking trips throughout the Sierra Nevada's and other wild places have had a profound impact on my perspective. A sunrise on the back side of Half Dome, descending through time into the Grand Canyon and experiencing nature's extremes are just some of the moments of magic and unbounded joy that I have felt."
